The captain at first thought the accident not a serious one, but when he had rounded the point at Governor's Island and got out like the point at Governor's Island and got out like the deep stream he saw that there was danger of the boat going down with her big load of human freight.

The water continued to pour in and the hull of the vessel sank deeper and deeper.

The passengers began to get over their panks, not realizing the imminence of the danger.

Some had grabbed life-preservers at the first niarm. The officers on board had assured the passengers that there was no danger, and the men encouraged the women and allayed their fears.
